Row Erupts Over DIT Faculty Plans

A row has erupted in DIT Kevin Street over the move of the Food Science programme to DIT Cathal Brugha Street under the institute's proposed new faculty structure. The dispute has arisen only weeks after the publication of the faculty structure report by the DIT's governing body. A petition signed by more than 600 students from DIT Kevin Street, most of whom will not be affected by the move, has been delivered to Dr Brendan Goldsmith, President of the DIT. It requests that the Food Science and Food Technology option of the Applied Science degree be part of the Faculty of Science rather than the Faculty of Tourism and Food Science. The report by the Governing Body states the case for the course remaining in a faculty of science was well made but that "the anomaly of parallel courses being offered on two sites is evident and the industrial placements undertaken by students in their final year."

Mr Crosbie described as ridiculous the idea that Food Science should be transferred to the new faculty because it is primarily a science degree. "Kevin Street is considered a science faculty and so Food Science should remain here."

He expressed concern that the industrial placements, "a major part of their qualification" would be adversely affected by the move to the new faculty.

Mr Frank McMahon, acting Director of DIT Cathal Brugha Street, told the DIT Examiner that the issue was a matter for the Governing Body and that he had no function with regard to the decisions taken. He believed that the department to which a course was attached would be more determining of its nature than the faculty. He likened the situation to a student in UCD doing economics who was in the same faculty as someone doing Greek.

Dr Brendan Goldsmith has said elsewhere in this paper that the document on faculty structures was not intended as the "grand blueprint for the future of DIT."

He said that he was willing to listen to issues from both sides on a number of issues. "I have an open mind and if people can convince me that it should be different then I will be happy to recommend it to Governing Body that it should be so, but I expect them to put forward rational arguments."

At time of going to print there had been no response regarding the petition from DIT Kevin Street.
A Sight for Sore Eyes

Over the past month we have seen not one but two example of an event that could accurately be now termed a phenomenon, or, if you’re feeling nasty, an aberration, such has its irregularity become in recent years. Even the most optimistic of us could not have foreseen the enthusiasm and sheer size of the students demonstrations that took place in Aungier Street and then, two weeks later, at the middle of Dublin City. The organiser might not have said so publicly, but in the nervous moments leading up to November 17 in particular, there were moments of great uncertainty and cold fear. It could easily have been a disaster had the students not turned out in the numbers they did – rarely have the people who organised the event spent so much time looking at weather forecasts for there can been little doubt that had the rain come down in the manner it normally does there would have been some red faces in USI and in students’ unions across the country. But it didn’t, and they came in number that no one predicted. It was a peaceful and good natured affair and was certainly deserving of a great deal more publicity than it received. Had the Government not chosen November 17th as the day to implode, the event would surely have made the television news – it was actually mentioned as a ‘coming next’ item but the astonishing events in the DIT were, in fairness, even more fun to watch.

It was international students’ day, a date chosen to remember the death at the hands of the Nazis of nine Czech students. It was designed as a day of solidarity within the student movement, a show of strength but while the strength was there in numbers the event lacked the killer blow of an issue, a single issue which would have given added relevance and impetus. Still, that is a quibble; what is important now for all students unions and USI most of all is that the moment is not permitted to slip away to become nothing more than a fond memory of one day in one year. A start has been made, energy must be focused and directed towards moving forward from here. But no matter how committed the students’ unions are, the real power lies with the students, those who came out on November 17th and those who did not. Don’t make it a one off.

The effects of a concentrated demonstration were strikingly felt over in the newest DIT site at Aungier Street when more students than anyone could have hoped for (or dreaded in the case of the college authorities) plonked their arses first on the lobby floor and then on the street in angry protest at the lack of operational facilities for the Communications and Journalism students. It was a ridiculous state of affairs in this superbly equipped building and the demonstration was a last resort and an expression of frustration. The students immediately affected were these of course, but what was so encouraging to see was the number of students from other courses who displayed a solidarity that seemed to have gone by the wayside. And then there was the support from other colleges, and not only DIT sites. NCAD was there, as was Trinity and DCU. One day of committed protest was impressive enough, but they came back. On Friday. In the morning. And they stayed, happy, noisy and peaceful. And they got results.

Faculty Structures

The President of the DIT, Dr Brendan Goldsmith has said that the faculty structures document cannot be the blueprint for the future of the institute but already it is causing concern, among staff and students. This is not surprising, not only because change and movement is difficult, but because all sorts of conclusions are being drawn as to what the new structures will mean. In a climate of uncertainty, they are inevitable. The long term ramifications of the proposed structures are huge and far reaching for the DIT and there are good reasons for some degree of amalga- mation but with such resistance being displayed so soon after the publication of the document, it does not auger well for the immediate future. There are tough times ahead for the DIT and the current and very serious problem emanating from DIT Kevin Street is certainly not the last. At this time of the year, the last thing students need to be doing is worrying about where they are going to be and what kind of degree they will eventually have. It needs to be sorted out

Mamet's Mind Bomb

For David Mamet, a film moves along using pictures, whereas a play moves along with the use of dialogue. With Mamet's play "Oleanna" due to be released as a film, it will be interesting to see how he transfers the play version, which depends on dialogue, into a film.

It has been said that when leaving the theatre after a Mamet play, one realises that it has exploded in your brain. This quite aptly describes the after effect of "Oleanna" which has just finished its runs at the Gate Theatre.

The Gate production, directed by Ben Barnes, involves John, a New England College Professor, played by Stanley Townsend, and Carol, one of his students, played by Dana Bledsoe. The action takes place on campus, in John's office, which is simply furnished and softly lit, allowing focus on the characters and their dialogue. Put simply, Carol accuses John of sexual harassment, creating the conflict of interpretation which energises the play.

John says he does not know how to talk to Carol, other than "to be personal" and Carol reacts: "why would you want to be personal with me?" Carol also asks John why he stayed with her, to which he replies, "I like you".

Throughout the play, there exists an ambiguity about what the characters say and mean. John says "we can only interpret the behaviour through the screen we create", which suggests that we take meaning from the perspective we "create".

Both actors capture very well the subtlety of human emotion. Dana Bledsoe, as the student, credibly conveys the helplessness of not "understanding" her course work, felt by most students at some stage. Yet she develops her character into a threatening, potentially damaging force later in the play.

Stanley Townsend manages to act the sensitive lecturer while harbouring a brutal edge until the last scene. He empathises with Carol by recalling his own past, yet, in a less controlled state, he poses a physical threat.

For Mamet, the ability to write dialogue takes the ability to "split oneself in two". In "Oleanna", the spectator is split between Carol and John's differing interpretations, as John objects to the claims of sexual harassment, saying that his behaviour contained "no sexual content".

As in Mamet's other works (Glengarry Glenross, Speed the Plough), The Cryptogram, Mamet's latest play highlights the difficulty of language as a means of communication. Each character interrupts the other's sentences and phrases are repeated. This results in fractured dialogue, making it difficult to gain a clear sense of what the characters are trying to say.

As both characters seek "understanding", they seek control. Carol is upset when she does not "understand" her course work: "What do you want from me... Who should I listen to...?". John, too, seeks to understand Carol's accusations when she says, "Do you know what you have worked for for power? For Power."

"Oleanna" is a thought provoking play, where one attempts to understand the fractured, yet highly charged, dialogue. It will be interesting to see if the film version of the play is as explosive.

Good Ideas From Bolton Street

Three Architecture Students from DIT Bolton Street have won second prize in the 1994 Zephyr European Architectural Ideas Competition. The award was made recently at Bartlett School of Architecture in University College, London.

The students, Hugh Kelly, Gavin Duffy and Patrick Harrington had, as had the other entrants, to design a mixed use building located in an area which would have a predominant need for cooling. Competitors could select their own site anywhere in the Southern EU or use a site in Athens for which information was supplied in the extensive competition documentation.. The competition was divided into two sections, one for architects and one for students. In all, 183 completed entries were submitted, 94 from architects and 89 from students. All were appraised during the summer by a team of technical assessors. The award comes with a prize of 5,000 ECU.

An exhibition of all the entries will be held from Monday, 16 January to Saturday, 21 January 1995 at the School of Architecture, University College Dublin and a book of the competition is in preparation.

There used to be such mystery attached to hypnotism. There was something kind of weird and sexy about the idea of it; using hidden powers to force others to do as you biddings; in films it was almost always used by nefarious sorts to further their plans for world domination. And the audiences bought it; they knew little about it and were willing to accept it, in a less judgmental era, as part of the magic of the movies; the art of hypnosis turned up frequently in comedy, horror, drama and later featured often in cliff-hanger serials.

In this sophisticated and media saturated age, such simple mind trickery has lost its allure and therefore its ability to convince as a plot device. All you have to do is turn on the TV and there it is, practiced by a quick talking, grinning loon on other loons in varying states of indignity. Familiarity has indeed bred disdain and the last film I can recall such mind control being used in the manner of old is Indiana Jones and the Temple of Doom, which was of course inspired by the old Republic serials.

The main character in Russell Mulcahy's new film, The Shadow, uses such mind control. The eponymous hero, played by Alec Baldwin, employs his mysterious gifts to aid him in his never ending fight against crime. The Shadow is located firmly in the now slightly camp pulp novel/radio show/comic book world (Orson Welles with New York resembling Gotham City with the lights turned on, but it doesn't feel big, and perhaps that was the intention but that is a mistake in this kind of film, unless the main character is particularly interesting or the director can bring a very special something to the proceedings - Tim Burton for instance. Russell Mulcahy has a bold visual style; he is fond of swooping and gliding cameras but he is not great with such mind control. The Shadow is just another colourful, reasonably entertaining flick using an old story as it basis and dressing it up in natty special effects. It looks like a big film, (credit to the designers and special effects people), was brilliant - and he tends to bring that to all his roles. He is certainly handsome enough to be a semi-superhero crime fighter but his slightly thuggish good looks are again, more suited to suave crooks.

Penelope Ann Miller is underused, but at least the little she gets to do does not involve a damsel in distress scenario. For a feisty dame her character, Margo, doesn't really spark with Lamont. They aren't given enough time together and so their romance is very much by the way.

There is one quick fire exchange between the two but all it does is serve as an indication of what could have been. Mostly she gets to wear great dresses.

but The Hudsucker Proxy is full of that Coen Brothers feeling - literature, idiosyncratic dialogue, stunning and surreal visuals and a host of characters who generally act normal but will always do something very, very odd. This is the Coens in accessible mode and some will no doubt say that they have sold out to a big budget (Joel Silver is the producer) but let 'em whine. The Huducker Proxy is hugely enjoyable.

Mary Shelly's Frankenstein

Big Budget. Big hype. Big Mistake. Kenneth Branagh set out to make a film that was faithful to the oft filmed novel and he tries to pack in everything, and then some. What he has given us is a lavish and very big film but the good in it is far outweighed by the melodramatic (yes, so was the book but that doesn't mean it has to be included), the silly and the unnecessary.

Branagh plays the not so good doctor who, driven half demented by the death of his mother and later his mentor, endeavours to create new life from bits and pieces of various bodies. The resulting creature, played De Niro who brings nothing special to the role, is rejected by Frankenstein, and so runs amok, exacting revenge. It's a great story, as contemporary now as it was when Mary Shelly wrote it, and Branagh has certainly given it his all but when a film of such potential horror gets too many laughs for all the wrong reasons, then there is something seriously amiss.

Pulp Fiction

It's all been said before of course but I'm more than willing to say it again. Pulp Fiction is a stunning piece of film making: funny, clever, stylish, knowing, literate, assured and though violent, it's no bloodfest. It's got a great script, a clutches of first rate performances (Samuel Jackson and John Travolta take a bow, Bruce Willis, try to do it more often) and a visceral, in your face style that is impossible to ignore or forget.

 Quentin Tarantino pulls out all the stops in this, only the second film he's directed. Three tales, apparently separate but finally interlinked, make up this riveting film. There's nothing original in the actual plots but its what Tarantino does with them that makes him special. The squeamish among you should set your jaws, square your shoulders and make the effort.
A Nightmare for Anger Street

Perhaps it was the novelty aspect of the whole exercise - after all, there hasn't been a decent disruptive student sit in for years. Or, possibly, the choice between attending classes and being boisterous was no contest at all. Of maybe - do we even dare to imagine that seems to have marked the end of the students. To misquote Peter Finch in Network: "We're mad as hell and we're not going to take it any more."

Whatever the reason, and the last scenario is the most encouraging, the students of the DIT took to the floor, and later the streets, in impressive, noisy and determined numbers recently and made themselves heard very very clearly. There were also contingents from Trinity College, Dublin City University and some Euro delegates around the building at the time, the students seemed to want them?" Now the not unexpected response at this point, given that hitherto unquestioned apathy of your modern students, would have been "well, as soon as you have a moment actually, but no, we're not going in a hurry". Instead the more insistent and thankfully shorter cry was "NOW."

And so it continued, with the chanting broken only by announcements from Lar Moran, and on the second day (the second day!?) USI Deputy President Colin Keaveney, regarding the reason for the demonstration and the effect it was having on the college authorities (aside from annoying the Jesus out of them).

For the record, the demonstration was organised as a protest at the lack of facilities for the communication and journalism students. By the end of Day One, following a certain amount of discussion with Aungier Street director Jim Hickey, the only movement had been made by the students. And the plan was that they regroup and begin all over again the following day, a Friday. Would they think? It was a lot to hope for. After all, Friday is practically the weekend. Traditionally, much of the dirt is undone on this day, even by the modern, academically focused crowd. Also the weather forecast was not a cause for optimism. Oh ye of little faith.

At 9.30am the sitting had begun again, the rubbish bins once more in the tight grip of those with delusions of rhythm. And the banging began.

Unsuspecting passing students were encouraged, cajoled and otherwise persuaded to join in, sit down and shout out. The demands were the same, the enthusiasm still very much in evidence, the decibel level only marginally less. The only moment which threatened the whole shebang came when persons, who shall remain unnamed for their own good - what the Hell, Ronan Haughey and Helen Ryan - decided rashly that the time was right for a spirited rendition of the unofficial DIT Song. Let me assure you, the time will never be right for a rendition of the DIT Song, spirited or otherwise, for it is truly and spectacularly awful. Some desultory warbling was attempted, student apathy rose, tightly, to the fore and the exercise was wildly abandoned before anyone was badly hurt.

Out on the street, there was a goodly amount of traffic just crying out to be disrupted. The students, obliging as ever, answered the cries and at 11.30am a goodly number of arses were plonked onto the middle of the street. Within minutes the traffic was backed up as far as the eye could see and the steely eyed protectors of the peace were very much in evidence. The whole thing was very peaceful, however, and what was encouraging was the amount of local support for the demonstration. Many people who in the past had probably uttered the words "bloody students" in irritated tones were now hanging around and nodding at the necessity for the event. Of course - everyone was inside; one crusty old gent tried with the aid of angrily wielded stick to beat his way through the very middle of the crowd and one of the more demented members of our courier brethren simply drove very fast at people. I sincerely hope he didn't injure himself ater on.

Colm Keaveney and Lar Moran were deep in consultation with the Gardai and following a Red Sea type parting for an ambulance, the assembled masses moved back inside, happily and quietly, but with the collective caveat that there would again be a gathering on the streets if there was not some progress from the head honchos inside. No further action was needed.
Sound Structures?

It was inevitable that the Faculty Structure proposals for the Dublin Institute of Technology would be the source of debate, suspicion and, probably, acrimony. As the Institute strives to integrate further the various sites and to encourage a single identity for the DIT, certain problems were sure to arise. When a document is leaked, as the DIT's faculty structure document was, then you can be sure that interest is high and that people are worried.

Change is a very difficult thing, as Dr Brendan Goldsmith, President of the DIT, is no doubt intensely aware. He is very keen to make one thing very very clear regarding the document, something that sounds quite startling, but really shouldn't:

"One of the issues I want to make clear to people is that no-one should see this small document on faculty structures - he holds up the 34 page report by the governing body on faculty structures and drops it on his desk, as the grand blueprint for the future of the DIT. It is not intended to be and it falls very short of the margin if it is being judged at that standard. If you like, you've very much the laying of a skeleton, a part of the development of the DIT and there are much wider issues to be addressed."

Dr Goldsmith's determination to clarify this matter suggests that there has already been some criticism of the document from within the institution.

"Some people have written in and said they were very disappointed that they haven't addressed this, this, this and this. In that sense they are missing the point; this is a limited report with a very limited objective. It's merely starting us off."

It has been criticised as being unbalanced and it seems clear that this is just the beginning of the objections, for it seems likely to raise hackles, through real or imagined slights. Already there have been representations made with regard to the school of modern languages which is listed in the faculty report as being part of the faculty of Applied Arts and Culture. Some have argued that it would be better suited to the Faculty of Business. Dr Goldsmith argues that nothing is yet set in stone. "I am willing to listen to arguments from both sides and the same hold for a number of other areas. I have an open mind and if people can convince me that it should be different then I will be very happy to recommend it to Governing Body that it should be so, but I expect them to put forward rational arguments, not just 'I don't want to move, I don't want to be with Joe Bloggs.'"

Reading between the lines there is a strong feeling that resistance to the proposed changes could be formidable.

"The whole thing was written with the view that this is the first step along the road, the next step of getting senior people on board is going to be critical. One of the issues I am most conscious of is that in the old document there is one reference to technicians; that's not to say that DIT regards technicians as unimportant; indeed they are key players in the whole scene but they will be addressed at the next step down the road and the same holds in relation to other, say, academic issues. Some of the things in this document are developments of the IPA report because it seemed appropriate to leave them in, but real academic issues will be thrashed out when we have a couple of key players on board and I think it important that people realise that."

This document could not be the blueprint for the future of DIT and it was not intended to be.

The faculty structure document suggests that the DIT should be restructured into six faculties and a Centre for Continuing Education. The faculty titles suggested for these faculties are: Science, Built Environment, Applied Arts and Culture, Business and Food Science and Tourism. Over an undefined period this will require much movement of courses and students from one site to another and it is certainly a move that cannot be rushed. Dr Goldsmith acknowledges this.

"I don't envisage movement to any new sites right away because there is not the physical capacity." Importantly, he adds that there 'may be some small movement'.

He believes that the amount of movement will be quite small, not for the individuals involved but on an institute wide level. Practicability dictate that this will take some time. "There are some things that are desirable but are just not on, maybe for a number of years, depending on the physical movement." The date given on the document for the implementation of the new structures is, surprisingly, September 1995. Is this not rushing the process? Dr Goldsmith doesn't think so. "It depends totally on course on us getting the go ahead at a fairly early stage. If it drags past the dates we have suggested by any amount we'll have to let it slip back by about a year. The last thing we want to is to end up with a kind of a half way house; that would be a disaster."

The Governing Body of the Dublin Institute of Technology has defined a faculty as a grouping of schools or departments in such a way that the courses presented by the faculty have a coherent relationship.

The Six Faculties and their suggested constituent schools:

- Faculty of Engineering:
  - School of Civil & Building Services
  - Engineering
  - Mechanical Engineering
  - Electronic & Communications Engineering
  - Control & Electrical Engineering

- Science:
  - Biomedical Sciences
  - Chemistry
  - Physics
  - Mathematics & Information

- Built Environment:
  - Architecture
  - Property Studies
  - Environmental Technology
  - Construction Studies

- Applied Arts & Culture:
  - Conservatory of Music and Dance
  - Art & Design
  - Social & Legal Studies
  - Modern Languages

- Business:
  - Management
  - Distribution
  - Accountancy
  - Marketing

- Tourism & Food Science:
  - Tourism Services
  - Food Operations
  - Food Science & Technology

The date given on the document for the implementation of the new structures is, surprisingly, September 1995. Is this not rushing the process? Dr Goldsmith doesn't think so. "It depends totally on course on us getting the go ahead at a fairly early stage. If it drags past the dates we have suggested by any amount we'll have to let it slip back by about a year. The last thing we want to is to end up with a kind of a half way house; that would be a disaster. I think if we get directors and faculty administrators appointed reasonably early next term then I think they can do the necessary groundwork." The faculty directors are due to be appointed in January and the Administrators in February of next year. This raises another important question, whether or not the current site directors will automatically become faculty directors. The answer is that where an individual was a principal at the time of the DIT (1992) Act coming into force, he will be guaranteed a directorship. This means that Kevin Street's director, Frank Brennan, and Jim Hickey (Aungier Street) are guaranteed directorships under the new structure whereas in the other DIT sites, where there are currently acting directors.
there will be open competition for the positions. In all cases the posts will be held for a fixed period, not yet decided, though the report suggests five years as a possibility. It has not yet been decided whether the Centre for Continuing Education will be a faculty, nor has a location been agreed for it. "Some solutions may emerge from the physical development plan that we are hoping will go ahead very soon. We've been given permission by the department to proceed with this and we are currently taking submission from a number of companies. The governing body will make a decision as to which one to appoint."

"Little mention is made in the report about the student body and the prospect of a move is certain to cause concern. Dr Goldsmith feels that the immediate impact for them will be minimal."

"From the student perspective in the very short term, they probably won't be aware of it. In the longer term what we would hope to see happening is a better tapping into a wide range of resources within the institute than heretofore. One of the issues that I am aware of is that the college situation for many reasons, most of them historical, hasn't necessarily allowed cognate disciplines to pull together; in many cases it has been the opposite." Dr Goldsmith has a grander plan in mind for the very long term and the faculty structure is but part of this.

"Quite honestly, my objective would be to see DIT evolve towards essentially into a two campus operation, by which I mean a north and a south city campus. I would regard Aungier Street and Kevin Street as a south city campus and there are possibilities for development there. On the north side it is a little more difficult. Bolton Street and Cathal Brugha Street are a reasonable axis for us. We are inclined to think of those two as quite a distance apart because the city intrudes, in actual fact they are very close. If we can find some other location in that direction to expand on that, that would be ideal."

"One of the sections of immediate interest to students is that concerned with Student Services. A cohesive student services unit is to be developed. It will be staffed by a Student Services Officer, who will be Senior Lecturer 1 level, one senior counsellor and six counsellors, a student services administrator (Grade 7) and two support staff. Though the student services officer will be at SL1 level, this does not mean that he or she will be an academic, although Dr Goldsmith does not rule out this possibility. He describes the role as an extension and widening of the existing student services position, held at present by Dermot Hegarty.

"The report of Faculty Structures in the DIT began as the institute's response to the IPA report on such structures but it has gone further down the road, and although a slim document, will have serious ramifications for everyone in the DIT. It will be interesting to see how it is implemented."

Super Students Get the Gold

Thirty five DIT graduates were presented with Gold Medal for Academic Excellence at a special ceremony recently in DIT Kevin Street's Gleeson Hall.

Back in June 1991, Academic Council had decided that it would be a good thing for the institute to honour those students whose final exam performance showed a level of excellence in excess of that of their peers and other students on comparable programmes. Or, those students who worried everyone else by continually asking for more paper during the exams.

The ceremony, the first of its kind for the DIT, honoured graduates from the years 1991-93. Each recipient signed the DIT Roll of Honour. At the ceremony, DIT President DR Brendan Goldsmith said that the gold medal awards were a clear sign, "if one is needed, of the commitment of DIT to academic excellence in its undergraduate programme."

A Marvellous Day Out

At the bottom of Kildare Street, which had been blocked off by the Gardai, to the passive annoyance of the crowd, an old woman was attempting to get by. Having satisfied himself that she was in no way part of the demonstration filing past, a young Garda moved back a crash barrier and allowed her pass. She looked up at this protector of the street and asked: "What's going on?"

"Ah, you know, students," Students. Long term code word and catch all expression indicating high jinx, noise and myriad irritating shenanigans undertaken by young scruffy types. The old woman wasn't satisfied.

"What are they marching about," she pressed, eyes seeking the truth in the cop's face. Perhaps she was an infiltrator after all. I leaned forward for his answer.

"Ah, you know, housing, facilities, better grants, dole money during the summer, that sort of thing," I retrieved my jaw from the ground. What was it? Was he perhaps a fifth lumpy sweater? Was he perhaps a fifth cop's face. Perhaps.

Meanwhile, the barriers and join them, join them on the other side. Come to the light, come to the light. The police ignored her. The police ignored her. Until she shot back and began jumping up and down again. "Don't touch me. Don't you touch me." Both were making themselves very clear. Twice.

As Macnas, cunningly disguised as some dragons, the demonstration, some 10,000 strong, incurred the wrath of drivers all over the city, not to mention those people with exceptional hearing; for the noise was truly deafening, a veritable cacophony (copyright Dave Carmody in 'I've got a big Thesaurus' mode) of whistles, horns, drums and human voices bellowing out a variety of slogans. And indeed, here was a problem, for there was no simple issue justifying the march. This was International Students Day, and as the young Garda rightly surmised, the march was organised for a number of reasons. Consequently, when the cry went out of "What do we want?" guiztical looks were exchanged and several answers were offered. The end result was a slight lack of vocal cohesion. The whistles however, all sounded the same, which was something.

When the marchers made it to their final meeting point, the very middle of O'Connell Street, again to the consternation of people in cars - a number of stirring speeches were made, the assembled students responding with a gusto diminished by hours of marching and shouting. As the cheerful masses hung on every passionate word - journalistic license - a man with a motorised street cleaning apparatus, taking advantage of the vehicular emptiness of O'Connell street, furiously and at great speed shined up the area. The outdoor activities finished with The Wilde Oscars, the cause of more jumping up and down, and it was all good clean fun, but My God, there were some dreadful, undecipherable sights in any of several pubs later. It was a fitting end to a day that often looked like it would be an unmitigated and embarrassing fiasco for the organisers, and was then dealt the ill-timed blow of a collapsing government which took up all the news - and I never thought I would describe the fall of the government as a "blow". However, it all worked out, thanks to hard work, good organisation and a commitment to ensure that a message was delivered. I, for one, had been sceptical. I am off to buy a hat which I will then eat.

Haughey Helps Bring Down Government

Ronán Haughey is Charlie Bird. DITSU's very own Special Correspondent was on hand at DIT Bolton Street recently, complete with very serious expression and big microphone, to nab former Taoiseach Albert Reynolds as he left the university having attended some function or other. Little did the intrepid Haughey know that he was about to scoop the entire Irish press corps, that the then Taoiseach was to rattle off, in that flippant tone of his, a sound bite that has turned out to be. That case of foot in mouth disease has been captured forever on videotape for the unrivalled enjoyment of politics watchers everywhere. It forms just part - but what a part - of a video put together by Ronán and Bolton Street's Chaplain, to highlight the issue of student poverty in the 1990s. Never once dropping his guard and smiling, Ronán set out to talk to students, students' union representatives, politicians and, where he could, to look as righteously indignant as Roger Cook. Indeed, what it lacked in technical brilliance it made up for in anger and disgust at a situation whereby students are often forced to live in appalling conditions - cue some shots of thoroughly unpleasant flats - and at the same time are perceived as sloppy and careless spendthrifts. Still, as timely and relevant the whole video is, and though it raised a sequel.

Counsellors Band Together

Student Counsellors from third level institutes all over Ireland have come together to set up the Irish Association of University and College Counsellors. They launched their policy document recently in the DIT's head office.

The basic aim of the association is to co-ordinate and promote the development of an effective, professional service in third level colleges. The infant organisation has, at present, 25 members. At a time when the DIT has just released its long awaited faculty structure document, which includes a section on student services, it seems as if the moment was chosen wisely.

Susan Lindsay, DIT Counsellor, says that it is a complicated story.

"About two years ago we came across an article in a paper about student stress; it could have been by a doctor and we felt that there should also have been a counsellor expressing an opinion because most of us have been in the business for quite a long time and have built up considerable expertise." There was a general feeling among counsellors that they were a resource that wasn't being tapped into and that counsellors needed more of a voice. A coming together offered the chance for solidarity and strength in numbers and that is all very well and laudable but unless they can at the very least make representations regarding policy, they may be somewhat toothless beyond their immediate and important day-to-day work.

Ms Lindsay recognises this.

"We have access to a lot of students and we build up a lot of information and we need an opportunity to share that; that's the case we'll be arguing, that we have to have access to decision making committees. The counselling service cannot be marginalised; it needs to be

Barring opposition from the Government, and that is unlikely, a faculty structure is one such practice which will have huge implications for everyone involved in the DIT. Its indirect effects will be more marked on some than on others.

"I think any amount of uncertainty can cause a certain amount of stress, particularly among vulnerable students; there are a fair proportion of students whom it won't affect but for those vulnerable few it is an added stress. I think we will see an increase in people coming to see us. We're already seeing it in areas such as semesterisation where there have been changes. No doubt we'll see it when the faculty structure emerges, even staff are going to be affected so that's bound to filter down to students, and if you get unhappy staff, that applies."

Semesterisation is well under way in the DIT. It remains a somewhat contentious development in certain areas, though its future seems secure. Ms Lindsay believes that the counsellors and by definition, the Association, have a lot to offer in respect to this area.

"One of the areas where we can help in a more practical way is by giving feedback to the various managers and administrators and designers of these courses, let them know what's happening on the ground. Some of these courses are maybe designed without taking into account the real effect it can have on some students. With this in mind, Ms Lindsay and a colleague are currently preparing a report evaluating the whole area of semesterisation, concentrating on how it is affecting students, whether or not it is working, insofar it is relates to the students' well-being."

"That was one of the things that we emphasised at the launch, that counsellors can't confine their role to the merely curative, that have to be more proactive and one of the ways is by having access to decision making committees and we can intervene and identify practices that are not beneficial to the students' well-being."

The Faculty Structure outlines the development of a more cohesive Students Services Unit, which will be headed by a Student Services Officer, who, it is envisaged, will have a co-ordinating and managing role. It is quite likely therefore that he or she will be in a position to make such representations to the relevant people within the DIT. The newly formed association clearly sees a much greater role for students counsellors within third level institutions. It will be interesting to watch how it develops the proactive role about which Ms Lindsay speaks.

Mountjoy Square Reels in Awards

Mark-Ivan O’Gorman, a visual media student in DIT Mountjoy Square has won the “Overall Film and Video Award” at this year’s Jesuit Film and Video Competition. He was presented the award for his video drama “The Infected City”, by Michael D. Higgins, TD, Minister for the Arts, Culture and the Gaeltacht (at least he was at the time) at a recent reception.

Meenad Sanford, also a student in DIT Mountjoy Square, was selected as the winner in the “Best Irish Language Programme” section of the competition, for her environmental awareness programme, “Fox”.

The competition attracted entries from, among others, Dublin City University, the University of Ulster, DIT Rathmines (as it was then), the College for Art and Design Dan Langhaire, Limerick University and Waterford RTC: “The Infected City” will be shown on RTE at a later date.
