Recognizing Food As Part of Ireland's Intangible Cultural Heritage.

Máirtín Mac Con Iomaire
Technological University Dublin, mairtin.macconiomaire@tudublin.ie

Follow this and additional works at: https://arrow.tudublin.ie/tfschafart

Part of the Other Social and Behavioral Sciences Commons

Recommended Citation

This work is licensed under a Creative Commons Attribution-Noncommercial-Share Alike 4.0 License
Recognising Food as part of Ireland’s Intangible Cultural Heritage

Abstract

Drawing on evidence from across a range of disciplines (literature, folklore, history, sociology etc.) this paper explores the lack of an iconic link between Ireland and food, explaining the reasons why Ireland and food are not immediately linked in the popular imagination. It argues for recognition of foodways as a significant element in Ireland’s intangible cultural heritage. It highlights and interrogates constructs such as ‘national’ and ‘regional’ cuisines, charting the growing scholarship around Irish food history from the ground breaking work of A.T. Lucas and Louis Cullen to a recent emerging cluster of doctoral researchers. The paper identifies the potential in ideas of the Annales School for the study of Irish food history. Finally, it argues for a serious engagement with Irish language sources claiming that this Gaelic heritage can provide a competitive advantage in a new age of innovation and creativity.

Keywords: Ireland, Foodways, gastronomy, cultural heritage, UNESCO, food history, folklore

Introduction

Apart from costume, food and diet are among the most noticeable markers of cultural otherness within intercultural encounters. Anthropologists have long identified that our processing of food before ingesting marks us apart from other animals, with a leading British primatologist insisting that it was cooking that made us human. Bord Bia, the Irish Food Board, promotes Ireland internationally as ‘The Food Island’ and their Food Wise 2025 programme plans to double Irish food exports to €19 billion by the year 2025. Fáilte Ireland has recently published its food tourism strategy where it notes that through its Food Strategy 2014-2016, it ‘sought to shift the perception that Ireland is a producer of great ingredients to that of a nation with an authentic cuisine.5 Ireland has long been famous for its food but not necessarily for its cuisine or cooking. A.T. Lucas noted that Irish food displayed a remarkable continuity of tradition ‘from the time of the earliest documentary evidence down to the widespread adoption of the potato in the late 17th century’.6 The American comedian Milton Berle once joked that Irish Gourmet Cooking was one of the four shortest books in history, but Colman Andrews, former editor of Gourmet Magazine disagrees, noting that ‘no other nation in Western Europe – not even Italy or Spain – remains so intimately and pervasively connected to the land as Ireland does.’7 Irish cuisine has been deemed by former Irish Times columnist Kevin Myers to be an oxymoron, and others have discussed it in less than glowing terms.8 Undoubtedly influenced by colonial attitudes to the inferior other, this unenviable reputation, however, has been reversed in recent decades with Irish chefs and restaurants winning prestigious international awards9. Growing research into Ireland’s culinary heritage has also assisted in revealing a more balanced and nuanced story about our ancestors’ dining habits and foodways10. Despite its lacklustre fame, Ireland’s culinary reputation has not

---

8 Kevin Myers, “An Irishman’s Diary”. The Irish Times, 7 February 2002; for discussion on how Bord Fáilte advertised to the French tourist market that Ireland was renowned for its food ingredients but not necessarily its cooking see Marjorie Deleuze, ‘La Dimension Identitaire des Pratiques, des Habitudes et des Symboliques Alimentaires de l’Irlande Contemporaine.’ (PhD diss., Université de Lille III, 2015).
suffered as badly as English cuisine. Among the issues this paper will discuss is whether the foodways and cuisine of one country should be considered more valuable or sophisticated than that of another.

Drawing on multiple sources ranging from mythology, topography, literature, archaeology, food history, folklore, cookbooks and women’s magazines, this paper will outline current thinking on food as an element of Irish cultural heritage, and provide a critical review of the literature on Irish food history to date. The paper calls on food writers, scholars, chefs, educators and government agencies to recognise and celebrate food as part of Ireland’s intangible cultural heritage. It will discuss the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organisation’s (UNESCO) inclusion of food on their representation list of the intangible cultural heritage of humanity in 2010. It will discuss the growing scholarship on Irish food history, outlining how new techniques, archives, and sources are providing a clearer picture of this under-researched emerging discipline.

Finally, harnessing Fionnbarra Ó Brolcháin’s argument that Ireland’s lingering postcolonial shame regarding its heritage and traditions is counterproductive for the Irish economy, this paper argues for a serious re-engagement with Irish heritage. Irish language sources are highlighted as especially valuable to help historians and researchers paint a clearer and fuller picture of Ireland’s culinary heritage. Vincent Morley notes how the refusal of so many historians to use sources in the Irish language has had a remarkable effect in how it ‘consigned the bulk of the Irish people to the role of non-speaking extras in the historiography.’ Declan Kiberd points out that ‘it would be hard to imagine French people...”

11 Voltaire is reputed to have said that in England ‘they have sixty different religions but only one sauce’. Tallyrand was a little more generous noting that ‘England has three sauces and three hundred and sixty religions, whereas France has three religions and three hundred and sixty sauces’

12 Fionnbarra Ó Brolcháin, Meon Gaelach, Aigne Nuálaíoch (Baile Átha Cliath: Coiscéim, 2011).

paying much heed to a history of their country written by someone with no working knowledge of its language; but they do (or did) these things differently in Ireland.\textsuperscript{14}

Food as Cultural Heritage

The Oxford English Dictionary notes that the word ‘heritage’ derives from the Old French heritage, from hérer ‘inherit’, and define it in a number of ways: (1) Property that is or may be inherited; an inheritance; (2) Valued objects and qualities such as historic buildings and cultural traditions that have been passed down from previous generations; (3) Denoting or relating to things of special architectural, historical, or natural value that are preserved for the nation; (4) Denoting a traditional brand or product regarded as emblematic of fine craftsmanship; and (5) Denoting a breed of livestock or poultry that was once traditional to an area but is no longer farmed in large numbers\textsuperscript{15}. Food fits well into a number of these definitions encompassing the long renowned cultural tradition of hospitality in Ireland, or the fine craftsmanship or the island’s smoked salmon, butter or farmhouse cheeses. There has been growing interest in recent years in heritage breeds of Irish cattle such as the Dexter\textsuperscript{16} or the Kerry cow, and in heritage breeds of potatoes such as the ‘lumper’\textsuperscript{17}. There has also been a slow but gradual rise in the number of ‘traditional’ or ‘heritage’ foods and drink seeking Protected Designation of Origin (PDO) or Protected Geographical Indication (PGI) status from the European Union (EU)\textsuperscript{18}. Whereas cows, potatoes, cheese, salmon or indeed whiskey are tangible products, Irish cuisine, meals, food traditions or food festivals are part of our

\textsuperscript{15} Oxford English Dictionary, ‘Heritage’ https://premium.oxforddictionaries.com/definition/english/heritage [accessed 11 May 2017]

\textsuperscript{16} 'Dexter Beef makes first appearance on shelves' Irish Examiner, 4 October 2017, https://www.pressreader.com/ireland/irish-examiner/20171004/282230895897207 [accessed 10 May 2018]

\textsuperscript{18} A European system for the protection of the geographical names of certain foodstuffs (which have a tangible link to the geographical area after which they are named) was established by Council Regulation 1151/2012. Protection under the system is absolute and extends to translations of the name, evocation, misuse or imitation. Regulation 1151/2012, and related Regulations 664/2012 and 668/2012, were given effect in Ireland by the European Union (Quality Schemes for Agricultural Products and Foodstuffs Regulations) 2015 [S.I. No. 296 of 2015]. PDO (Protected Designation of Origin) for products with a strong link to the defined geographical area where they are produced, whereas PGI (Protected Geographical Indication) for agricultural products and foods linked to a geographical area where at least one production step has taken place. See https://www.agriculture.gov.ie/gi/pdopgitsg-protectedfoodnames/ [accessed 11 May 2017].
intangible cultural heritage. Although they deal with tangible and consumable materials, the style and manner of consumption remain a part of intangible culture.

Tangible Heritage

Since 1972, UNESCO has had a programme to protect the world’s cultural and natural heritage, known as the World Heritage List, directed mostly to the protection and representation of tangible, monumental elements of past cultures or natural environment. Two Irish sites are currently listed: Brú na Bóinne - Archaeological Ensemble of the Bend of the Boyne (1993) and Sceilg Mhichil (1996). There are seven other Irish sites, shown below, on the tentative list since 2010, which highlight sites the State are currently considering for nomination:\(^{19}\)

- The Burren (2010)
- The Historic City of Dublin (2010)
- The Céide Fields and North West Mayo Boglands (2010)
- Western Stone Forts (2010)
- The Monastic City of Clonmacnoise and its Cultural Landscape (2010)
- Early Medieval Monastic Sites (2010)
- The Royal Sites of Ireland: Cashel, Dún Ailinne, Hill of Uisneach, Rathcroghan Complex, and Tara Complex (2010)

The Masterpieces of the Oral and Intangible Heritage of Humanity was initiated in 2001, as UNESCO’s response to the call for humanity to widen its concept of cultural heritage by bringing in the intangible aspects, since the original World Heritage List excluded many Southern Hemisphere cultures which did not produce monuments or other physical cultural manifestations:\(^{20}\).

Food as Intangible Heritage

UNESCO defines oral and intangible heritage as ‘the totality of tradition-based creations of a cultural community expressed by a group or individuals and recognized as reflecting the expectations of a community in so far as they reflect its cultural and social identity’.\textsuperscript{21} Culinary traditions are among the many other forms of intangible heritage which includes language, literature, music and dance, games and sports, rituals and mythologies, knowledge and practices concerning the universe, know-how linked to handicrafts, and cultural spaces. Intangible heritage is seen as a repository of cultural diversity, and creative expression, as well as a driving force for living cultures. UNESCO encourages communities to identify, document, protect, promote and revitalise such heritage since it can be vulnerable to forces of globalisation, social transformation, and intolerance.

---

Between 2001 and 2005, UNESCO proclaimed 90 Masterpieces but this list was superseded in 2008 by the Representative List of the Intangible Cultural Heritage of Humanity. It took nearly a decade for culinary traditions to materialise and receive specific recognition. Since the first inclusion by UNESCO of food on its list in 2010 (France, Croatia, Mexico), however, there has been a growth of inscriptions by various countries concerning their food and drink related cultural traditions (Table 1). It is interesting to note that certain countries such as Croatia are well represented on the list, particularly for their size, while others fail to appear at all. In 2017, Ireland appeared on the list for the first time when the musical practice of Uilleann piping was inscribed on the UNESCO list of the intangible cultural heritage of humanity\textsuperscript{22}.

Protecting Geographical Foods: AOC’s, PDO’s and PGI’s

Certain countries and regions of the world are renowned for specific food and beverage traditions and products – for example Sushi (Japan), Parma Ham (Italy), Champagne (France). In France, Roquefort cheese was regulated by Parliamentary decree in 1411, and became the first French cheese to be awarded an Appellation d’Origine Contrôlée (AOC) in 1925. The AOC of French wine was set up in 1935 based on the concept of ‘terroir’, meaning the complete natural environment, including factors such as the soil, topography, and climate, in which a particular wine is produced.

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Year</th>
<th>Country</th>
<th>List of Elements</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>2010</td>
<td>Mexico</td>
<td>Traditional Mexican cuisine - ancestral, ongoing community culture, the Michoacán paradigm</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>2010</td>
<td>Croatia</td>
<td>Gingerbread craft from Northern Croatia</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>2010</td>
<td>France</td>
<td>Gastronomic meal of the French</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>2013</td>
<td>Turkey</td>
<td>Turkish coffee culture and tradition</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>2013</td>
<td>Georgia</td>
<td>Ancient Georgian traditional Qvevri wine-making method</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>2013</td>
<td>Belgium</td>
<td>Shrimp fishing on horseback in Oostduinkerke</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>2013</td>
<td>Cyprus – Croatia – Spain – Greece – Italy – Morocco – Portugal</td>
<td>Mediterranean diet</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>2013</td>
<td>Korea</td>
<td>Kimjang, making and sharing kimchi in the Republic of Korea</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>2013</td>
<td>Japan</td>
<td>Washoku, traditional dietary cultures of the Japanese, notably for the celebration of New Year</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>2014</td>
<td>Armenia</td>
<td>Lavash, the preparation, meaning and appearance of traditional bread as an expression of culture in Armenia</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>2015</td>
<td>Democratic People’s Republic of Korea</td>
<td>Tradition of kimchi-making in the Democratic People's Republic of Korea</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>2015</td>
<td>Namibia</td>
<td>Oshituthi shomagongo, marula fruit festival</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>2015</td>
<td>United Arab Emirates – Saudi Arabia – Oman – Qatar</td>
<td>Arabic coffee, a symbol of generosity</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>2016</td>
<td>Tajikistan</td>
<td>Oshi Palav, a traditional meal and its social and cultural contexts in Tajikistan</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>2016</td>
<td>Azerbaijan – Iran (Islamic Republic of) – Kazakhstan – Kyrgyzstan – Turkey</td>
<td>Flatbread making and sharing culture: Lavash, Katyrma, Jupka, Yufka</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>2016</td>
<td>Belgium</td>
<td>Beer culture in Belgium</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>2017</td>
<td>Italy</td>
<td>Art of Neapolitan ‘Pizzaiuolo’</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>2017</td>
<td>Azerbaijan</td>
<td>Dolma making and sharing tradition, a marker of cultural identity</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>2017</td>
<td>Malawi</td>
<td>Nsima, culinary tradition of Malawi</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Table 1: Food and Drink related Cultural Traditions enshrined by UNESCO

A European system for the protection of the geographical names of certain foodstuffs (which have a tangible link to the geographical area after which they are named) was established by Council Regulation 1151/2012. Protection under the system is absolute and extends to translations of the name, evocation, misuse or imitation\(^\text{23}\). Ireland has a number of active PDO’s and PGI’s – Connemara Hill Lamb; Imokilly Regato Cheese; Oriel Sea Salt; Oriel Sea Minerals, and the Waterford Blaa / Blaa. There is potential for more – applications for Sneem Black Pudding and Wexford Blackcurrant(s) have been submitted to the European Commission following national consultation. However, the group approach favoured by the Regulations and the restrictions on including a member State’s name in the PDO/PGI have contributed to limited interest in Ireland. From the perspective of alcoholic spirit drinks, the rules are slightly different since 2008.\(^\text{24}\) This geographical indication identifies a spirit drink as originating in the territory of a country, or a region or locality in that territory, where a given quality, reputation or other characteristic of that spirit drink is essentially attributable to its geographical origin. Irish Products included in the Legislation includes (1) Irish Whiskey/Uisce Beatha Éireannach/Irish Whisky; (2) Irish Cream; (3) Irish Poteen/Irish Poitín. Ireland has historically been more associated with drink than with food. Colman Andrews notes that ‘no sane person ever questioned the quality of Irish stout or whiskey’ but that apart from Irish stew and soda bread, most outsiders did not know what the Irish ate. National stereotypes of Irish cuisine were apparent in jokes such as that a seven course dinner in Ireland was a potato and a six pack of Guinness.\(^\text{25}\)

Regional Cuisines, National Cuisines or the Cuisine of Empires

Similar to the AOC system, food fits better within a regional system than a national system. The concept of national cuisines is relatively recent and has generated a literature of its own. In this context Italian cuisine is an interesting case study. Italian cuisine has achieved global popularity, but does such a thing exist? Italian unification or the Risorgimento was not completed until 1871 although it began with the Congress of Vienna (1815). Italian food is really a combination of various regional foods based around the original city states and even further based on the more local concept of campanalismo - symbolising a sense of identity, of pride, and of belonging to the place of your birth, a feeling which is usually much stronger to an Italian than any sense of national identity. Rachel Laudan argues that empires are a more suitable lens by which to explore cuisine than nations and notes that one of the most influential empires was the Christian empire, which dominated all of Europe, including Ireland, for so long.

\(^{24}\) see Regulation (EC) No 110/2008

Scholars agree that national cuisines are reliant on texts for their authentication. Pellegrino Artusi’s La scienza in cucina e l’arte di mangiar bene (The Science of Cooking and the Art of Fine dining), published in 1891, is widely identified as helping develop Italian national cuisine as it introduced dishes from the South to the North and vice versa. It is also widely understood that François Pierre La Varenne’s (1651) La Cuisinier François was the first codification of a distinctive French cuisine. Up until relatively recent times, French haute cuisine was the hegemonic model favoured by a pan-European élite, and evidence of this 28 Stemming from ‘campanile’ or ‘bell tower’ it refers to the area surrounding your village where you can hear the bell from. See https://ilcampanilismo.wordpress.com/2014/10/11/the-concept-of-campanilismo/ [accessed 11 May 2017].

29 Laudan, Cuisine and Empire.

cuisine is found in both Irish and other European literature.

Beginning with Irish missionaries, there has been a long and steady connection between Ireland and France, and indeed throughout Europe based on religion, education and trade.

The appearance of three recipes specifically ‘in the Irish style’ included in Lancelot de Casteau’s (1604) cookbook Ouverture de cuisine, published in Liège, may be explained with reference to the fact that the author had previously served as master cook to three prince-bishops in the sixteenth century and their possible relationships with Irish missionaries. On commencing his viceroyalty, the Duke of Rutland (1784–1787) dispatched the chief cook of Dublin Castle to France to expand his culinary repertoire by completing ‘stages’ at French royal courts such as the renowned gourmets, the Franco-Irish Bishop of Narbonne, Arthur Richard Dillon, and the Duc d’Orléans. Although apparently selective, as examples these both confirm that transmission of culinary knowledge and practices between countries, nations, and regions has a long history and that information flowed in both directions.

What about the situation where culinary knowledge and traditions remained oral and were not preserved in text? Arjun Appadurai describes the construction of a national cuisine in India as being a postcolonial, post-industrial process, and Dorothy Cashman draws on his work to explain why there are no recorded recipes from sources that could be considered native Irish or Gaelic in the Irish manuscripts cookbooks associated with the Big Houses in Ireland that she researched. Appadurai argues that ‘if we take the long view of Hindu thought, which has left ample textual deposits, it is possible to assert that while gastronomic issues play a critical role, culinary issues do not’. While copious records exist about the immense

---

32 Marjorie Deleuze, “‘Well, we didn’t pass a bit o’ remarks on it. It was second nature to us’: The Rituals of Fasting in Ireland before Vatican II” Canadian Journal of Irish Studies 41(2018), 226-249.
33 Leg of Mutton roasted in the Irish style; To garnish a duck in the Irish style; To prepare a peeled head of veal in the Irish style.
36 Appadurai, ‘How to make a National Cuisine’.
amount of food that was consumed, little is recorded in the Hindu tradition about how it was cooked. This absence extends across legal, medical and philosophical texts; while there is an amount of information regarding taboos, prescriptions and injunctions concerning food, there are no recipes: — ‘the processes that transform ingredients into dishes are invariably offstage’39. This is equally true to Ireland where Cashman confirms that apart from a handful of texts, the growth of Irish authored cookbooks runs nearly in parallel with the foundation of the State in 192240.

Irish Food Tradition or National Irish Cuisine – Does it exist?

In an Irish context, it is probably more reasonable to discuss the concept of regional cuisines which are influenced by geography, climate, religion and tradition. Myrtle Allen,41 of the renowned Ballymaloe House, Co. Cork, has noted that in Ireland we belong to a ‘geographical and culinary group with Wales, England and Scotland as all countries share traditions with their next door neighbours’42. This could also account for the difficulty of creating a ‘national’ cuisine. During the Celtic revival in the late nineteenth century, nobody thought of food culture as an element in nation building. Literature, folklore, music, and drink were considered, but food remained outside that list of chosen ‘national’ categories. The relatively modern concept of ‘national’ food, therefore, presents certain difficulties of definition in an Irish context, having gained independence only in 1922. Yet, similar to Pellegrino Artusi’s book in Italy, a number of Irish authored and Irish centred cookbooks appeared in the decades after independence.43 Vincent Morley notes, however, that Catholicism and national identity were linked explicitly in the early 1600s; and much to the surprise of both republicans and revisionist, that it was then (and not in the 19th century) that 39 Appadurai, ‘How to make a National Cuisine’, p.11.

41 Myrtle Allen opened the Yeats Room in Ballymaloe House in June 1964 and became an award winning chef and restaurateur. She is one of most influential and culturally significant people in the story of Irish food in the last fifty years. See https://vimeo.com/73151483 [accessed 16 May 2017].
43 Department of Agriculture Cookery Notes, (Dublin: Stationery Office, 1922); K.E. Warren, The Tailteann Cookbook (Dublin: W.M. Warren & Sons, 1935); Florence Irwin, Irish Country Recipes (Belfast: The Northern Whig, 1937); Maura Laverty, Flour Economy (Dublin: Brown & Nolan, 1941); Maura Laverty, Kind Cooking (Tralee: The Kerryman, 1946); Josephine Marnell, Nora Breathnach, Ann Martin, and Mor Murnaghan. All in the Cooking: Coláiste Mhuire Book of Household Cookery (Dublin: Educational Co. of Ireland, 1946).
the word ‘náisiún’ or ‘nation’ began to appear\(^{44}\). Central to his argument is the contention that the version of the Irish past propounded in early modern literary Irish by Seathrún Céitinn in Foras Feasa ar Éirinn (1634-5)\(^ {45}\) – a Catholic people, whose lineage survived Norse and subsequent depredations – was disseminated in less elevated language by rhymesters and songsters, principally in the oral tradition\(^ {46}\). From its arrival in the 5\(^{th}\) century, Christianity has influenced the dining patterns of the Irish. The observance by the early Irish church of fast and abstinence is apparent in the Irish names for Wednesday, De Cétain/De Ceadaoin or ‘first fast’ and Friday, Ain didine/De Aoine, or ‘last fast’\(^ {47}\). The four quarterly feasts of the old Irish year, Imbolc (1\(^{st}\) February), Beltaine (1\(^{st}\) May), Lughnasa (1\(^{st}\) August) and Samhain (1\(^{st}\) November) gradually yielding to Easter and Christmas, with St Brigid’s day seeking to supplant Imbolc and St Martin’s day seeking to supplant Samhain. The old Irish festivals and patterns with many of their associated traditions, including foodways, have remained remarkably strong\(^ {48}\). From Easter eggs, roast lamb, geese, turkeys and plum pudding, to roast beef, colcannan and barm brack, each festival has its associated food heritage and tradition, even if the harsh fasting and abstinence of pre-Second Vatican Council Catholicism is a fading memory to those old enough to remember Pope Paul VI issuing Paenitemini (1966)\(^ {49}\).

Cashman highlights this sharing of traditions between the island of Ireland and its nearest neighbours ‘that are rooted through and beyond historical contingency’. She notes Tom Jaine’s discussion of the English kitchen where he criticises those commentators who malign English cookery and deny its existence, ‘that by dint of its derivative and imitative character it has lost all claim to discrete identity’. Jaine argues the absurdity of this claim, noting that ‘if English people cook, the product must be English cookery’\(^ {50}\). Cashman similarly \(^{48}\) See Diarmuid Ó Giolláin ‘Celebrations and the Rituals of Life’ in The Cambridge Social History of Modern Ireland, eds. Eugenio F. Biagini and Mary E. Daly (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2017), pp.297-311. Ó Giolláin draws on evidence from the Irish Folklore Commission and from writers such as Amhlaoibh Ó Súilleabáin, Sir William Wilde and Hugh Dorian.

\(^{49}\) Deleuze, ‘Well, we didn’t pass a bit o’ remarks on it’; See http://w2.vatican.va/content/paul-vi/en/apost_constitutions/documents/hf_p-vi_apc_19660217_paenitemini.html [accessed 4 April 2018].

proposes that if Irish people cook, however that concept of Irishness is construed, the same argument holds true, although now in the context of globalisation, that narrative becomes somewhat more complex. Unlike France or Italy, where there is a distinct difference between the food eaten in the north and south of those vast countries, the climate and regional food of the British Isles does not vary dramatically. However, some regional specialties do exist and writers often use reference to these to locate a character within a certain context. Maura Laverty exhibited this to good effect in her novel Never No More:

I always looked forward to Shrove Tuesday and to Gran’s pancakes, which were not made in the Kildare way with an ordinary batter of milk and eggs and flour. She made them as they make them in the West of Ireland, with grated raw potato. She got her recipe for boxty potatoes from her mother who was a Mary Kelly from Galway…. The boxty pancakes were crisp little crumpet-like cakes that were eaten hot with butter and sugar as they came from the pan. Shrove Tuesday was unthinkable without boxty-on-the-pan. They were the fortunetellers that gave you a glimpse of what the coming year held for you.51

Laverty’s description, published in the mid-twentieth century, highlights regional variations of foodstuffs within the island of Ireland such as Farls, Boxy, Blaa, Ballach Buí (Salted Ballan Wrasse), Drisheen, Coddle, or Yellowman. Many of these dishes and other such as Colcannan, Steampaí, Gingerbread, Sugar Sticks (or Peggy’s Legs) are also found in poetry and songs from the Irish tradition52. The flavour principles of ginger and caraway are abundantly evident in the baked dish traditions of Ireland and Gingerbread appears in multiple sources53. Blaa is to this day associated with Waterford, Coddle with Dublin, Drisheen with Cork, Periwinkles with Kilkee, County Clare and Yellowman with the Auld Lammas Fair in Ballycastle, County Antrim (see Figs 1 and 2).

---

Irish food hidden in plain sight

It is said that we don’t appreciate what we have until it’s gone. Research by the company Denny’s sausages found that half of Irish people surveyed had brought sausages with them in their luggage to a foreign country at least once in their life.\(^\text{54}\) Travellers from Ireland only realise that the varieties of sausages, bacon, tea, crisps, butter, milk, chocolate, bread, biscuits, sweets and many other food items that they take for granted, cannot be widely purchased abroad. Cathal Cowan and Regina Sexton undertook the Irish part of a European research project seeking to categorise and document traditional foods across Europe. Some of the more unusual foods they categorised as Irish were commercial products Kimberley, Mikado, and Coconut Cream biscuits, clove rock and apple drops (boiled sweets), alongside the more traditional boiled bacon and cabbage and Irish stew.\(^\text{55}\) Bord Bia’s ‘What Ireland Ate Last Night’ study found that Ireland’s favourite style of dinner in 2011 was a classic ‘meat and two veg’ which accounted for almost 1 in 6 of the previous night’s dinners. In fact, 6 in 10 people in Ireland had consumed a classic meat and two veg dinner in the previous week. The survey found that age-old traditions were firmly ingrained in our evening meal choices, with fish consumption peaking markedly on a Friday. Meat and two veg and specifically roast beef dominated the Sunday menu, although roast chicken dinners and spaghetti bolognise topped the poll of specific dishes mentioned. Diners consumed potatoes in 40% of all the previous nights’ evening meals, not including chips or wedges which featured in a further 16% of meals. In fact the survey found that almost 8 in 10 Irish people had eaten potatoes with dinner at least once in the previous week. This confirms quite a conservative trend in Irish eating habits, adhering to traditional Irish dishes and cuisine, despite the rise of globalisation and increased availability of foreign foods.

\(^{54}\) Although perhaps not the most objective research, it is of interest to the argument being made; See Patricia Murphy, ‘Half of Irish people sneak sausages into their suitcase before boarding a plane’ (1 April 2015) http://www.independent.ie/life/food-drink/food-news/half-of-irish-people-sneak-sausages-into-their-suitcase-before-boarding-a-plane-31111430.html [accessed 10 May 2017].

Figure 2: Ballach Búi – Salted Ballan Wrasse

---

Dissenting Voices

There are still some commentators who until recently advocated that Ireland did not have a food culture and that the term ‘Irish cuisine’ was oxymoronic. Hasia R. Diner suggests in her monograph Hungering for America: Italian, Irish and Jewish Foodways in an age of Migration that Ireland failed to develop an elaborate national food culture, and that unlike those of other peoples, ‘Irish writers of memoir, poems, stories, political tracts, or songs rarely included the details of food in describing daily life’. She also notes that those who observed them or recorded Irish voices rarely represented them as wanting to eat better or craving particular items. Diner’s thesis is based on a selection of writings particularly associated with the Celtic revival at the end of the 19th century, where Irish people were encouraged to learn and speak the Irish language, give their children Irish names, play Irish music, and dress in the manner of the Irish. The fact that they were not encouraged to eat Irish food is not evidence of its inexistence, as Diner argues, but that they had already been eating Irish food, which was unremarkable because of its similarity to English, Welsh or Scottish, in other words, British food. Without the capacity to emphasize Irish difference and distinctiveness, food could not be appropriated as a means to promote cultural and political independence. Diner’s argument also overlooks a long tradition of hospitality, and of using descriptions of food in songs and poetry to satirise lack of hospitality as in the Middle Irish tale ‘Aislinge Meic Con Glinne’ (12th century) for example, in Antaine Ó Raifteir’s (1784-1835) poem ‘Bainis ar an tS’leacháin Mhóir’.

It also ignores a long tradition described by Katharine Simms as ‘guesting and feasting’, whereby the Brehon Law tracts outlined various legal rights to hospitality in Ireland, or where hosts voluntarily issued invitations to a 57 Myers, ‘Irishman’s Diary’; Dennis Cotter in the introduction to The Café Paradiso Cookbook (Cork: Atrium, 1999) noted that Ireland did not have a culinary heritage and that we had a blank canvas to work with, but this assertion was removed from subsequent editions.

feast. Diner’s argument similarly indicates her lack of awareness of texts, some in the Irish language, such as Cín Lai Amhlaoibh by Amhlaoibh Ó Súilleabháin, of Callan, Co. Kilkenny; Retrospections of Dorothea Herbert 1770-1806; The diary of Nicholas Peacock; The Synge Letters; or Society and Manners in nineteenth century Ireland which contain numerous food references. Kerby Miller notes that John Gamble’s accounts of his travels are unusually rich and remarkably free of both sectarian and class prejudice, and that his knowledge of the Irish language also made him an especially acute observer of life among the poor inhabitants of Ulster’s mountains.

Irish Language Sources

The French ‘histoire des mentalités’ describes a particular way of researching and writing history principally associated with the Annales School. Theodore Zeldin’s five-volume masterpiece A History of French Passions (1973-1977), which described private emotions, instead of a narrative of public events, has a 17,000 word chapter on food and drink in France. Although the French have long studied mentalities, Irish historians have concentrated more on high politics focusing on archival documents left by the ‘winners of conflicts’. In Ireland, ‘tradition’ – how ordinary people remembered things (including language, food, and much of our heritage) – has been left to the folklorists, and is often disseminated via the oral tradition. The ground breaking work of folklorists such as Henry Glassie, Estyn Evans, Caomhín Ó Danachair, Brid Mahon and Patricia Lysaght on food must be acknowledged. Vincent Morley notes how the failure of so many historians to use

---

64 The first general Irish history book to include two chapters on food and diet was Louis M. Cullen, The Emergence of Modern Ireland, 1600–1900 (London: Batsford Academic and Educational, 1981), ch. 7 and 8; Other early food history books include Regina Sexton, A Little History of Irish Food (London: Kyle Cathie, 1998); Leslie A. Clarkson and E. Margaret Crawford, Feast and Famine: Food and Nutrition in Ireland, 1500–1920 (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2001).

sources in the Irish language had a remarkable effect on our official history. Declan Kiberd points out the absurdity of a history of any country written by someone with no working knowledge of its language. Kiberd argues that the narrowly linguistic focus in University Irish Departments tended towards a neglect of the content. One clear exception to this observation was Breandán Ó Buachalla, whose book Aisling Ghéar is compared with Vincent Morley’s The Popular Mind in Eighteenth-century Ireland as the most radical remapping of Irish Studies to appear in the past 30 years.

!Figure 3: Scairbh na gCaorach – Shelf of the Sheep (Emyvale)

---

From an Irish food heritage perspective, although scholarship in the field is growing in recent years, Irish language sources still remain neglected and underused. The food ‘motif’ can be found throughout these texts from earliest times, from the dinnseanchas (placenames), Irish mythology, to the goliardic poetry of the medieval monks, through to the bardic poetry of Gaelic Ireland prior to the Flight of the Earls (1607). From the ancient pagan Gaels, converted by Christian missionaries (5th century), raided and eventually settled by Vikings (9th century), Norman barons (12th century), prior to annexation by the English crown and finally, military and cultural defeat of the Gaelic order by that same English power (16th century), food appears as a constant motif in their myths, sagas, stories, songs and poetry. Writers such as Jonathan Swift and William Butler Yeats (albeit through the translations of Lady Gregory) were well-versed in this Irish language tradition of poetry and mythology drawing from it within their work. One such example is Swift’s translation of Aodh Mac Gabhráin’s Pléaráca an Ruarcach (O’Rourke’s Revelry) about a famous banquet held by a Leitrim chieftain in the sixteenth century: ‘O’Rourke’s noble fare / Will ne’er be forgot / By those who were there / Or those who were not. / His revels to keep, / we sup and we dine / on seven score sheep, Fat bullocks and swine’.

---

70 Dinnseanchas is a class of onomastic text in early Irish literature, recounting the origins of place-names and traditions concerning events and characters associated with the places in question. Dinnseanchas stories are also incorporated into saga texts such as Táin Bó Cúailnge and Acallam na Senórach. See Mac Con Iomaire, ‘The Food Trope’.

The diet of the Irish has been continuously changing, adapting and drawing influence from its neighbours, trading partners, invaders and the overarching influence of the Christian church/empire, which is firmly evident in the dinneanchas, the genre of early Irish literature, recounting the origins of place-names and traditions through associated events and characters. Food related place-names range from Cluain Meala (Honey Meadow - Clonmel) in County Tipperary (Fig. 4); Léim an Bhradáin (Salmon Leap / Lax Leap – Leixlip) in County Kildare; Scáirbh na gCaorach (Shelf of the Sheep – Emyvale) in County Monaghan (Fig. 3), to the more evocative Cuas Rinn an Aonbhallaigh (Cove of the point of the solitary wrasse - Coosrinaneanwallig) in County Kerry. Predominantly of Gaelic origin, some food-related Irish place-names have Viking, Norman or English connections. Many Irish people have little or no knowledge of the richness and variety of their ancestors’ diet—which included wild garlic, honey, grouse, game, white meats or bán bhia (milk, buttermilk, curds etc.), eels.

---

72 Laudan, Cuisine and Empire.
wrasse, oats, rye, gruel, pottage, watercress, apples, hazelnuts, bilberries, sorrel, tansy, and edible seaweed (Fig. 6)—prior to the arrival of the potato, all of which feature in Ireland’s place-names. Similar to the watercress eaten as a fresh meal in the old Irish tale Buile Shuibhne, certain seafood (cockles and dogfish) were considered ‘poor man’s food’. This is reflected in the seventeenth century poet Aogán Ó Rathaille’s lament for the days of his youth before the Battle of the Boyne in 1690, after which his Jacobite patron’s lands were confiscated and the poet and his family found themselves dispossessed. In his poem ‘*Is fada liom oíche fhiorfhliuch, *’ he notes that he had never experienced eating the food of the poor in his youth, in contrast to the aristocratic food of his patron. The wealth of food descriptions and similes in the pre-famine songs of Raiftearaí are worthy of a study all of their own. An outstanding example of an epic food song / poem of the nineteenth century is Raiftearaí’s ‘Bainis an tS’leacháin Mhóir’, a satire of a wedding to which the poet was not invited, where the poor couple had as a wedding breakfast only potatoes and salted herrings. It comprises eleven stanzas outlining the food and drink served at the banquet including material culture. Seven types of meat and poultry, eight game birds, fifteen finfish, five shellfish, cakes and yeast bread are listed. Drinks include ale, porter, whiskey, punch, brandy, rum, madeira and negus. White dishes, pewter plates, sharp knives, skewers, delft, china, tureens, teapots, white and speckled dishes, jars, tankards, glasses, tables, table cloths are described. The wedding turns into a mighty battle, however, with collected beggars spilling blood with cudgels. Contemporary famine-related songs have been identified and discussed by Cormac Ó Gráda, but the Great Famine greatly curtailed the strong oral tradition of storytelling, songs and music that had been so vibrant particularly in the Irish speaking districts in their ‘clachán’ based communities along the western Atlantic seaboard. Storytelling continued in the West where pre Famine patterns lasted for another two generations until the Irish Folklore Commission was able to collect much of it, and assemble one of the world’s largest folklore collections. The Schools’ Collection (1937-8) has been digitized by the National Folklore Commission was available online at www.duchas.ie.

77 For a rich source of the role of poets at the wedding feast in Ireland see Margo Griffin-Wilson, The Wedding Poems of Daibhí Ó Brudair (Dublin: Dublin Institute of Advanced Studies, 2010).
Collection in UCD and provides numerous food related stories as seen in the entry for Baile Scadáin (Herring Town / Balscadden) in County Dublin (Fig. 5).

Figure 5: Balscadden – Baile Scadáin (Herring Town) from Schools Folklore Collection

There has also been a tendency among commentators (particularly travellers’ accounts) to present discussions about food in Ireland before the famine in a binary fashion (wealthy or poor)\(^81\). Against this, Tomás de Bhaldraithe in the introduction to Cín Lae Amhlaoibh notes the vivid descriptions in Humphrey O’ Sullivan’s diary of the fine meals of the middle

---

\(^81\) For such claims see Daniel Corkery, The Hidden Ireland (Dublin: M.H. Gill and Son, 1956), p.10; Morley, The Popular Mind, p. 2 highlights that ‘there is no factual basis for Corkery’s claims that a middle class did not exist in eighteenth-century Munster’.
classes that confutes those who say that the Irish speaking natives did not have a varied diet or were not proficient in the art of cookery\textsuperscript{82}. Scholars from a diversity of disciplines (archaeology, history, sociology, folklore, linguistics, literature, architecture, drama, business, art and design) are currently engaging in research on Ireland’s food heritage, which highlights the transdisciplinary nature of gastronomy and food studies. This paper encourages them to engage with source material in the Irish language and to embrace our oral heritage, mythology and folklore to furnish a more dynamic and creative lens to their analysis.

Discussion and Conclusions

As previously highlighted, apart from costume, food and diet are among the most noticeable markers of cultural otherness within intercultural encounters\textsuperscript{83}. Krishnendu Ray notes that ‘nothing devalues a cuisine more than proximity to subaltern others’\textsuperscript{84} which may explain how, up until recently, the concept of ‘Irish Cuisine’ was considered by some to be something of a contradiction in terms. Things are changing dramatically concerning food in Ireland. Irish food is seen by state bodies as a driver of economic development, with Bord Bia promoting the country as ‘The Food Island’ and Fáilte Ireland’s new vision for food tourism being that ‘Ireland will be recognised by visitors for memorable food experiences which evoke a unique sense of place, culture and hospitality’\textsuperscript{85}. In the past, with its association with the domestic and the diurnal traditions, Irish food was far too quotidian to be valued, particularly when contrasted to the professional, modernism, and exoticism associated with French haute cuisine. William Wilde’s well known 1854 essay The Food of the Irish argued that the potato-consuming pre-Famine poor essentially subsisted on raw food, their roasted and boiled potatoes failing to qualify as cooked fare, compared to those with fine palates, who desire ‘pommes a la crème,’ making them ‘modern’\textsuperscript{86}. The hegemony of French haute cuisine, however, has been receding in recent years, and has been superseded by a new aesthetic that values local, seasonal, traditional and sustainable food – best illustrated by the

\textsuperscript{82} de Bhaldraithe, Cin Lae Amhlaobh, xxx. ‘Tá cuntas inti ar bhéilí bréatha an duine mheándeisiúil a bhreáognann an té a deir nach raibh éagsúilacht beatha is oiliúnt in ealaín na cócaireachta ag na Gaeilgeoirí.’

\textsuperscript{83} Leerssen, ‘From Whiskey to Famine: Food and Intercultural Encounters in Irish History,’

\textsuperscript{85} See www.failteireland.ie [accessed 3 April 2018]

New Nordic Food Movement. Many Irish chefs have been part of this new aesthetic and there is an emerging pool of talented Irish chefs winning international awards for their ‘new Irish cooking’\textsuperscript{87}. In 2010, food finally became recognised as intangible cultural heritage by UNESCO (see table 1). The Gastronomic meal of the French, gingerbread craft from Northern Croatia, and traditional Mexican cuisine were the first to appear but have been joined in subsequent years by food traditions from around the world ranging from Kimchi (Korea) to Nsima (Malawi)\textsuperscript{88}. Italian food traditions have been mentioned in this paper, yet the first appearance on the UNESCO list of an Italian food tradition was 2017, the same year as Ireland’s Uillean piping tradition was recognised.

!Figure 6: Duilleasc – Dillisk – edible seaweed

This paper has identified some reasons why Ireland lags behind many of its European neighbours in safeguarding our traditional foods with PDO’s and PGI’s. Irish people are renowned throughout the world for their hospitality, and Colman Andrews highlights that the Irish are more deeply rooted to the land than even the Italians; but unlike Italians whose ‘campanalismo’ is rooted in identifying with the food of their local village, parish or region, in Ireland that local pride and identity is reserved for our GAA sports clubs, where we identify first with local club, then county, then country. That is not to say we don’t have a food culture. Food marks the annual Irish festivities and traditions of Christmas (goose, turkey and ham, spiced beef, pudding, mince pies and Christmas cake); Lent (pancakes, fasting, fish); Easter (roast lamb, Easter eggs, hot cross buns); Summer (new potatoes, wild salmon, mackerel and herrings, strawberries and blackberries); not to forget the Michaelmas goose, Martinmas beef, and Halloween food traditions (barm brack, apples and nuts, colcannon). Even within the modern fast food culture, some dishes such as spice bags and curry chips are uniquely Irish. Coddle is still associated with Dublin and Drisheen with Cork. Boxty is more regularly available in the north-west Counties and Blaa has been recognised by the EU as coming from Waterford.

\textsuperscript{87} Mac Con Iomaire, ‘Contextualizing the Irish Food Renaissance’.

!Perriwinkle and Dillisk Seller, Kilkee, Co. Clare

Figure 7: Perriwinkle and Dillisk Seller, Kilkee, Co. Clare

From place-names to mythology, storytelling, poetry and songs, food and hospitality is a vibrant theme that runs through Ireland’s past. However, when the topic of food is discussed within the historiography of Ireland, the focus tends to be on the consequences of the Great Irish Famine (1845-52). Darra Goldstein points out that Ireland has suffered twice for its famines and food shortages: ‘first due to very real deprivations; and second because these deprivations present an obstacle to the exploration of Irish food. All too often the story begins and ends with potatoes or famine’. Another obstacle to the exploration of Irish food has been the focus on high politics rather than the ‘histoire des mentalités’ and the lack of engagement with sources in the Irish language by historians in the past. Tradition was left to the folklorists and often disseminated via the oral tradition. Much of this oral tradition (stories, songs, etc.) was documented for the first time during the Celtic revival in the last decades of the 19th century. Fionnbarra Ó Brolcháin highlights the creativity in literature, art, theatre and the academy that emerged during the Celtic revival when people embraced their heritage and used it to inspire dynamism. Ó Brolcháin argues cogently that Ireland’s Gaelic heritage gives it a competitive advantage in this new age of innovation and creativity. He notes that bilingualism, or indeed, as with many Nordic countries – multilingualism is an advantage, noting that ironically, despite being an English speaking country in the latter half of the 19th century, this did not advantage us in competing with the Danish for England’s butter market.

It could be argued that we are approaching a Celtic food revival, with a flowering of award winning Irish chefs, restaurants and artisan food producers drawing inspiration from the new Nordic food aesthetic by engaging with and re-imagining their indigenous food culture and traditions. Equally there is a palpable rise in academic interest in Irish food history and tradition. As noted above, recent research clearly demonstrates that Ireland’s culinary culture is much more nuanced than was previously understood. This paper argues that knowing and embracing our food heritage in the new millennium can give us competitive advantage and a unique selling point. Whether this manifests itself in promoting Irish food abroad or in increasing food tourism in Ireland, engaging and celebrating our food stories enable us to provide and enjoy more authentic food experiences and to also safeguard our intangible cultural food heritage for the next generations. This paper calls on Irish folklorists to identify and document the lesser known food traditions that are at risk of disappearing, such as the

---

90 Ó Brolcháin, Meon Gaelach, Aigne Nuálaíoch
Ballach Bui of Connemara and the Aran Islands or the periwinkle traders of Kilkee, County Clare (Fig. 7). It calls on food writers, scholars, chefs, educators and government agencies to recognise and celebrate food as part of Ireland’s intangible cultural heritage.